Max Paul (Berlin, 1992) lives and works between Bergen and Berlin. His practice spans a range of different media but often develops through his interest in the popular imaginary of art and architectural history and the traces this leaves in the urban fabric and people's minds.

He is interested in how a city's collective self-image is created through both random and intentional decisions in architecture, vandalism and city development and branding. His work conveys subconscious layers of references to classical and romantic archetypes.

In his work he has linked the fragments of a demolished Sex-Kino to the fragments of the Parthenon frieze, and the painterly style and expression on tourist busses with modernist painting tradition, Paul explores the resemblances and links between archeological fragments and art with that of contemporary compact powder makeup, foundation and bronzers.

Recently he has shown the surrealist visions of Berlin by the artist Werner Held (1904-1954) alongside the equally surreal visions by major contemporary real estate developers.
